The Right to Philosophy

Traces of the International College of Philosophy

Le droit à la philosophie: les traces du Collège international de Philosophie

The innovations accepted by the International College of Philosophy haven't stopped opening the thought to this world in its profound mutation. Nishiyama's movie is thus a very precious contribution to the work of "changing the world", because the change begins -to continue to quote Marx however in a distorted way-, in the "interpretation" of what the "world" signifies. Therefore also of what "international" and "philosophy" signify. —Jean-Luc Nancy

A wonderful cinematic documentary open to many contexts, an exceptional film about the topic of philosophy that demands a viewing from multiple angles. Through the cinematic medium, Nishiyama succeeded in reminding us of the task that contemporary philosophy is expected to undertake, of its responsibility to be of the world beyond the discourse of the West and the Rest. —Naoki Sakai

This is the first documentary film on the International College of Philosophy (Collège international de Philosophie), founded by, among others, Jacques Derrida and François Châtelet in 1983 in Paris. The aim of this film is to consider the possibilities of the Humanities in general and philosophy in particular under the current conditions of global capitalism. One of the main themes it tries to develop is the "question of the institution", namely the relationship between philosophy and institutions—a topic that was very central for deconstruction as elaborated and practiced by Derrida.
